Evaluating Job Offers

Accepting the Offer

To accept an offer, send the employer a letter restating the position title, salary, starting date and any other important terms of the offer. Don’t forget to inform all of your references, providing them with a proper thank you, an update on the company you selected and your position title. It’s considered poor professional etiquette to back out of an offer because another offer more to your liking comes along afterward. Try to avoid damaging any professional relationships that you have established with the organization.

Declining the Offer

If you decide to decline the offer, do so in a professional manner by sending a letter to the hiring manager who extended the offer. Avoid negative language in your letter. Let the employer know that after carefully evaluating all of the factors involved, you wish to decline the offer. Thank the employer for his/her consideration and decline on a positive note so that you don’t breach any future opportunities with the organization.

Negotiating the Salary

The idea of salary negotiation can cause a great deal of anxiety. To negotiate effectively, you’ll have to do a little homework prior to any conversation with an employer about your requirements for the position you’re seeking. Be sure to pick up our “Salary Negotiation” handout to learn more.
